IT'S UP TO YOU

WHEN United States law maintains prices above the world level, it destroys our export markets. A generation ago we were exporting 10 million bales of cotton a year. With far more people in the world last year our exports were around 2 million bales. The high price of American cotton has stimulated American cotton has stimulated American cotton has stimulated cotton-growing in many countries throughout the world.

If we had not interfered with the free market in cotton, those producers able to compete with world prices would continue to grow cotton and those unable to do so would have transferred their energies into some more profitable occupation. their energies into some more profitable occupation.

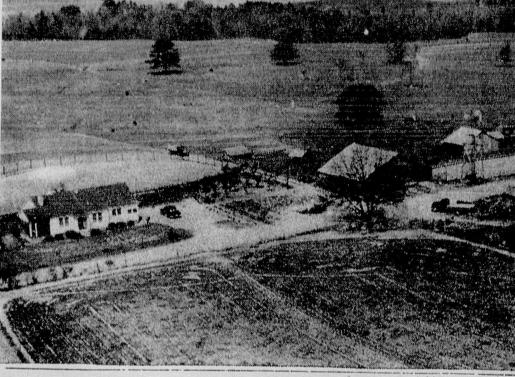

By maintaining a high price for cotton, we have destroyed our foreign markets, tied up nearly $1.7 billion in loans or ownership of cotton, and very soon many of those engaged in producing this commodity will have to change their occupation because of the loss of markets.

Instead of helping the cotton farmer, government intervention is forcing his retirement from that field of activity. It would have been far better to have
